Talent Matters: How to Network Effectively

The phrase "good networker" conjures up many mental images, and most of them are not positive: fake, pushy people who are only interested in you because they want a job or they want to sell you something.

Nancy-Jo Nunez, Cisco Systems, Inc.

Asked on 4 February

I am part of a learning and development cohort within the Talent Management group of a manufacturing firm that does business in Asia and Africa. We've historically had a difficult time in assessing the skills of our senior executives with regard to global management. What steps have others taken when faced with this problem? Do you have similar issues in your company? How formal are these assessments?

The first thing to look at is general leadership ability, including among other things strong ability to adapt one's leadership style, to empathize with other cultures and be able to shift one's point of view; a strong inclination to reach out to others with excellent two-way communication skills. If you can identify the cultures involved, the use of something like the Cultural Orientations Indicator from TMC (www.tmc.org) can be useful. Demonstrated experience and interest in global cultures through travel

10 Habits of Highly Effective Social Media Marketers

The one truism that seems to have weathered the downturn and on-again, off-again economic "recovery" is that the globalization of markets will continue at a steady forward pace and, therefore, so must our marketing capabilities to reach them. Just this past week, AdAge even proclaimed that a "tipping point" had been reached in the number of CMOs having a true global scope of responsibility.

Whether or not we are in fact at a watershed moment in global marketing leadership is up for debate, but most of us as marketers can agree that the decades-long trend of expanding into new markets is increasingly set against the backdrop of trying to create a more tightly knit global marketing organization. More and more marketer roles with a pan-geographic focus are surfacing in our conversations with members. Marketing processes are incorporating a more diverse range of inputs from across organizations' geographic footprint. Resource allocation post-credit crisis tends to be more reflective of countries' future opportunity versus simply our historical habit of investment.

But amid all of this progress, marketers tell us that they still struggle to see substantial gains in global marketing integration. One member recently commented, "the discussion internally has clearly shifted toward capitalizing on the scale of our international marketing operations but, if anything, it seems that we're moving further and further apart."
